

Are we getting utility bill designs all wrong?

By Bill LeBlanc

June 13, 2018

---

Even the best-designed bills are falling short of customer expectations. Learn how you can use design thinking to change that.

June 13, 2018

Are We Getting Utility Bill Designs All Wrong?

Bill LeBlanc

Through E Source's recent residential ethnographic research for E Design 2020, we identified discrepancies between the bills utilities send to their customers and the information customers want. Most bill redesigns focus on making it clear how much customers owe, reformatting for readability, adding elements of

Did you miss our web conference about bill redesign?

Download the presentation and watch the recording to learn about what customers want from their utility bill and how we can work together to redesign your bill using design thinking, E Source ethnographic research, and more.

Learn more

Given that the utility bill is often the only regular communication between customers and their utility, what kind of influence does bill design have on the customer-utility relationship? We identified three areas of improvement:

- Explain the value behind the bill
- Help customers prepare for their bills
- Give customers a choice

Explain the value behind the bill

Customers don't know what a kilowatt-hour or them is, and most people don't care to understand these terms. One woman told us, "just tell me what I bought, like how much it cost me to charge my cell phone or have my AC on."

People understand dollars, so how might we explain the value they receive each month in energy services for the money they pay? Shifting to a values-based bill design can benefit both customers and the utility, potentially reducing bill complaints. With the availability of smart meters, it's easier than ever to provide

Help customers prepare for their bills

Customers who have to budget for their bills, including low-income customers, feel they're in the dark about how big their bill is going to be. Some customers want to have an alert estimating the amount of their bill well in advance. Others wish they could pay more often than every month, even weekly or daily.

For these customers, it's more valuable to have a prediction of next month's bill than data on previous bills, which is a standard feature to show energy use over time. How might we change the bill design to combat the anxiety customers have about opening and paying their bill?

Give customers a choice

Customers don't like that they're "forced" to buy from a monopoly and have no choice in what they pay—participants were generally unaware of rate and billing options offered by their utility. Ultimately, it's the utility's and regulators' job to help customers control and manage their bills. But before jumping into that

How might we design a set of rate and payment options that customers can readily understand and choose based upon their lifestyle? Choice architecture is an art and a science; providing real options for customers will empower them to feel more in control even when they're buying from a monopoly.

Design thinking can help you reinvent a better customer bill

Our research reveals that even the newest redesigned bills are falling short of customer expectations, but by using ethnographic research and design thinking, we can reimagine the future of energy bills.

To learn more about our design-thinking approach, check out the recording of our recent web conference Radically Redesign Your Utility's Customer Bill Using Design Thinking. We revealed findings from our ethnographic research with real utility customers and described the design-thinking project that we're proposing.

Learn more

About the author

BILL LEBLANC
Chief Instigation Agent

Bill LeBlanc previously served the business as vice president for marketing, vice president for consulting, and vice president for research. He's also president of the Boulder Energy Group. Bill has more than 20 years of experience in strategic and social marketing, new product development, pricing, market research

Like you think, if you want to weigh in or chat about this topic, just email Kym Wootton (Source vice president of Marketing) or Follow Kym on Twitter.